

February 3, 2010

Making the decision to undertake significant home renovations can be a very daunting task. At least that's what I thought. But in reality, the decision was even more difficult than I imagined... The challenge I encountered revolved around the large number of contractors who were willing to promise or say anything to get my business. I literally interviewed 14 different renovation/construction firms before I spoke with Enterprise, and to be honest, I was beginning to wonder if there was anyone out there who I would feel confident with handling my project. But then my outlook suddenly got brighter.

After talking with Andy (who incidently showed up on time... which was a rarity during my interview process), I got a good feeling that Enterprise operated on the same values and principles that would be important to me in selecting a renovation specialist: experience, integrity, quality and communications. I contacted everyone on the Enterprise list of references, and some additional contacts recommended by the references. Given the overwhelmingly positive response, my difficult decision finally became a "no-brainer."

The staff at Enterprise who were assigned to my project were terrific, and by that I mean they were reliable, punctual, honest, responsive, professional and highly skilled craftsman. I would welcome the opportunity to work with Adze (Project Manager) or Pamela (Design Consultant) again in the future.

My project is complete, and the feedback I've recieved from family, friends and neighbors has been exceptional. If results speak volumes, then my house is quite a testament to the capabilities of Enterprise Contracting.

Sincerely,

Brian Sharrow